The National Institute for Mental Health reports a 1.6% prevalence (over twelve months) of U.S. adults diagnosed with borderline personality disorder (BPD). These roughly 5 million individuals constitute approximately 20% of our patient population. Patients afflicted with BPD present with perceptual distortions and difficulties maintaining stable relationships. They frequently exhibit extreme mood swings and use “splitting” in interactions with others. Patients with BPD often feel empty, angry, and abandoned, which may lead to desperate and impulsive behaviors. These individuals have very complex psychopathology and present tremendous challenges to clinicians.

On Friday, March 15, 2013, the University of Miami, in collaboration with Drs. John G. Gunderson and Glen O. Gabbard, two internationally renowned experts in the treatment of BPD, will present Borderline Personality Disorder: Good Psychiatric Management. This concentrated one-day course will feature didactic lectures, case presentations and videos. Learners will be provided a comprehensive theoretical and clinical understanding of BPD. This is a can’t miss opportunity for those interested in the latest psychological and evidence-based treatment approaches for this difficult disorder. Join us this March for an experience that will have a lasting impact on your patients and your practice.
